of Apple were the biggest faller in the Dow, after it announced it would unveil a pair of new iPhones on Sept. 9. The company also announced a streaming radio service called Apple Music, expanding its music offerings in a bid to liven up its all-important subscriber base. While Apple didn't say much new, there are some big bets on the future of Apple. Siri will try to converse Andrew

Hoyle/CNET One of the biggest was in the way Siri is set to try and start conversing with us in the future. Apple still wants to be the dominant player in the world of mobile technology, but because of its dependence on iOS, you've still only got so many people to sell to. At its financial call, the company said it was reaching out to the broader world of mobile phone users. Siri will, it says, be able to build a richer personal understanding of us -- while constantly learning. "Siri can be used for music, for flights, for places, for restaurants," Apple CEO Tim Cook told analysts.

"Siri will have a much richer understanding of you and your personal preferences over time." And here's the part where it does get a bit Orwellian, with Apple hoping to know more about you than you know about yourself. Siri is all about the data. But for all this data, Siri will want to listen to you and make recommendations to you based on that information. It will do this by being able to listen to your own conversations and then build a profile of your behavior. Siri could then start talking to you in a different
